

Team Journal – Day 7

Wednesday 29th March

Today we carried on the all-important team building and bonding exercise through recreation and rest. The team split, broadly, into three groups. A foursome headed down to St Lucia for a game of golf. Reports of this game are sketchy except that we do know that it was won by the Captain and Stuart, despite Nick's cunning ploy of authoritatively identifying a depression in the ground as lion spoor in an attempt to upset the rival pair's game.

.... team building through the medium of golf ...

The remainder of the team split into two, roughly equal, groups - those who returned to Hluhluwe Game Reserve and those who chose to bond in a restful manner at base camp over a bottle or two of South African wine. The goal of the return trip to Hluhluwe was to locate a herd of elephant in the southern part of the reserve. Unfortunately this goal was not achieved but many animals were seen and those who went reported a good, albeit long, day. Those who stayed behind did achieve their stated aim - and even saw the sun for a while.

... and through the media of relaxation, conversation and wine.

In the morning we leave at a reasonably early hour to head down to the battlefields and learn more about the Zulu wars. Of which, more tomorrow.
